

AMERICAN CHEMISTS PROVE GOOD DYEMAKERS

Report Issued by United States
Tariff Commission Tells of Growth of Industry.

The United States Tariff Commission has just issued a report entitled "Growth of Dyes and Color Materials." The report shows the success of the American chemists and chemical manufacturers in developing the dyestuffs industry when the supplies of dyes from Germany were cut off. At the beginning of the war Germany dominated the world's trade in dyes and drugs derived from coal tar. Prior to the war several American firms manufactured dyes from imported German materials. In 1917 ninety American concerns were engaged in the manufacture of dyes, drugs and other chemicals derived from coal tar, and of this number thirty-nine firms produced coal-tar dyes from American material which were approximately equivalent in total weight to the annual imports before the war. The total output of the 190 firms, exclusive of those engaged in the manufacture of explosives and synthetic resins, was over 54,000,000 pounds, with a value of about $65,000,000. Large amounts of the staple dyes, for which there is a great demand, are now being manufactured in the United States. A few of the important dyes, such as the vat dyes, derived from alizarin anthracene and carbol, are still not made in this country. The needs of the wool industry are being more satisfactorily met than the needs of the cotton industry. The report gives in detail the names of the manufacturers of each dye or other product and the quantity and value of each product, except in cases where the number of producers is so small that the operations of individual firms would be disclosed. Seventeen hundred and thirty-three chemists or engineers were engaged in research and chemical control of this new industry, or 8.8 per cent of the total of 19,612 employees. The report also contains an interesting account of the history and development of the industry since the beginning of the European war.
